HOME INDUSTRIES.

A Few Remarks on an Important Subject.

One of the most pressing needs in our growing community is the establishment of additional branches of home industries. We frequently hear it asserted that it is the duty of our citizens, who have grown wealthy in the Territory, to invest the accumulated capital in the establishment of such industries, even though it may appear that the returns on capital so invested would be, in the beginning at least, somewhat meagre and uncertain. Now, this assertion contains an amount of truth, but the question arises whether this duty is the only one connected with the subject. It might, with equal propriety, be said that it is the duty of those who have associated themselves with the interests of the community, to patronize to the fullest extent the productions of the industries which have been already established, or which might be undertaken in the future. A proper consideration of some existing facts in relation to this matter might not be altogether out of place at this particular time, when the Territory is struggling under a heavy burden brought upon it, to a great extent, by a somewhat excessive importation of merchandise from eastern and western markets, and by the unwise discrimination of the railroads, whose respective managers, while competing strongly for the opportunities of carrying freight into the Territory, have not deemed it of sufficient importance to compete for the carrying of any freight out of the Territory. Hence, our markets have been overstocked with goods from abroad and there has been no outlet for our surplus grain, and, in fact, our own markets for produce have been virtually monopolized by producers from other parts of the country. Imported grain could be purchased cheaper in Salt Lake City than that raised in our own Territory. This much for the causes which assist in producing the present great depression in trade.

There is already established in the city of Provo a very promising branch of industry in the shape of woolen mills, and the result is some very excellent home-made cloth, flannels, blankets, etc., are being placed by these mills upon our markets. The capitalists interested in these mills are doing their utmost to make this enterprise one worthy the support and encouragement of the community, and so far they have met with a marked degree of success. Many thousands of dollars worth of wool have been kept in the Territory, many people have been furnished employment, and great good has resulted from the establishment of this industry. But have the community at large patronized these mills as extensively as they might have done? Is it not a fact that the majority of the people are to-day wearing imported materials? Does there not exist an unfortunate feeling, amounting almost to prejudice, against anything that is home-made? If not, why is it that so many thousands of dollars worth of cloth and ready-made clothing are imported annually into the Territory? But it may be urged that the capacity of these mills is not sufficient to supply the demands of the entire people. Then let us by our patronage put it in the power of the management to increase their capacity, to handle more wool, to employ more hands, and to render them more efficient in competing with imported goods. In this connection we might ask why might we not establish factories for the making up of clothing in the Territory? We have large numbers of people who might profitably be employed in this way, and the large amount of money which is yearly sent abroad in payment for this class of labor would be more useful to us as a community if kept at home.

But the woolen manufacture is not the only industry that has been inaugurated in the Territory; there are others equally deserving of our support and assistance, among them the shoe factory, the overalls and underwear factory, the soap factory, and others. Yet notwithstanding these are all demanding our aid and support we are still sending out large sums of money to bring in imported shoes, imported overalls, soap, furniture, etc., all of which could be produced in greater abundance and even of better quality, perhaps, than they are at present, if the same amount of money which goes out of the Territory were devoted to the encouragement of these self-same industries at home.

It is sheer folly, for a community such as ours, to spend so much money for imported articles, while our exports remain so insignificant in comparison. Our prosperity is diminished thereby, and our Territory is continually drained of the very means which should be devoted to its development and the consequent welfare of its inhabitants.

There are hundreds of mechanics and artisans in our midst, gathered from every quarter of the civilized earth, and there is nothing to hinder the establishment of many more branches of industry among us if we would only act more unitedly in sustaining and encouraging home production. Thousands of our young men and young women might find lucrative employment if the proper steps were taken to introduce suitable industries. How many millions of paper sacks are annually imported? Do we make any? Again, are there not thousands of flour sacks needed by our numerous millers in the Territory every year? Are any of them made here? Have we any lace industries? No doubt scores of different articles could be suggested which might be made here, and thus supply employment to many willing workers who are now longing for something to do.

The importance of patronizing home productions will continue to force itself upon us, and it is time we devoted more of our attention to this matter. If we would be prosperous and have good times, we can all do a little towards it. No matter if home-made articles may at first appear inferior, or perchance a little dearer, encourage their production, and by and by it will be possible, by increased facilities, the removal of obstacles and the ambition to excel, to produce home-made goods which shall be second to none, but, indeed, superior to many imported articles which are at present preferred. Let us patronize our home-made cloth, shoes, matches, soap, brooms, furniture, trunks, clothing, etc., and perchance capital will be invested with greater faith, patient labor will obtain a more certain reward, and increased prosperity will be the lot of all.

A lady who had bought groceries had them weighed as they were sent home, and found them all right. So she went down and complimented him on his honesty, and he told her he always intended to do what was right, and then, after she had departed, he went and discharged the clerk who put up the goods.
